Une école primaire anglaise obligée d'acheter des traducteurs automatiques car plus de la moitié des élèves ne parle pas anglais

06/07/2010 à 20h32
A primary school where more than half of pupils are non-English speaking has become the first in Britain to give every child a computerised translator.

Around 60 per cent of the 384 pupils at Manor Park Primary School in Aston, Birmingham, now communicate with teachers using the software.

Pupils type in questions into the computer using their native language which is then translated verbally into English for the teacher.

Daily Mail

(Merci à Alex)